Feeding and foraging movements of medium- to large-sized predators studied via a second-by-second approach. In order to better understand how predators make decisions about when and where to search for food, we compared the foraging movements of adult female jays with an eye towards changes in prey density. We used a second-by-second approach to examine the movements of tagged female jays during 2 summer months at a common garden in the boreal forest of northeastern North America. We tagged 21 jays over a period of 4 days in May and 12 jays over 8 days in June. We also tagged an additional 8 jays in May and 12 jays in June at a different common garden about 20 km from the focal site. We measured total search time, time spent searching in areas with previously documented jay prey densities and spatial aspects of foraging flights. We observed overall prey encounter rates of 0.02 prey/ind/hr. We found no significant differences in search time by season, by time of day, by season x time of day or by time of day x season. Jays spent fewer search time in areas of lower jay density. This lack of correlation between search time and prey density indicates that the jays are able to vary foraging rates as prey density fluctuates. However, there was a negative correlation between flight durations and the volume of space covered, possibly indicating a time tradeoff with an increase in prey detection rate as the area searched decreased. We did not detect a time tradeoff with an increase in search time with an increase in time spent in areas with low prey density. Sudden severe elevation of serum creatine kinase due to carnitine deficiency. An 18-year-old woman suddenly experienced severe muscle pain and weakness and became progressively atactic. The level of serum creatine kinase (CK) was markedly elevated to 4,200 IU/L. Methylmalonic acid level was elevated to 0.93 mg/dL. The CK level was slightly improved after intravenous administration of carnitine. The patient subsequently developed hyper-carnitinaemia, fatty acid oxidation defect and pathological changes of myocardial tissue after oral administration of carnitine. Human papillomavirus in head and neck lymphoepithelioma: a pilot study. Human papillomavirus (HPV) has been implicated in the pathogenesis of malignant lymphoma of the head and neck. We investigated the prevalence of HPV in a cohort of patients with lymphoepithelioma of the head and neck. Eleven patients with biopsy proven lymphoepithelioma of the head and neck were included in the study. Biopsies were obtained prior to surgery, and real time PCR was performed to detect HPV. Patients were followed from 1 month to 5 years. One of the 11 patients tested positive for HPV, and that patient was positive for HPV 16. However, all patients tested negative for HPV by real time PCR after surgical excision of lymphoepithelioma. This pilot study suggests a relationship between HPV 16 and lymphoepithelioma, but this association is not a universal finding.
