A family gene for mitochondrial carnitine palmitoyltransferase 2. Mitochondrial carnitine palmitoyltransferase 2 (CPT2) catalyzes the first committed step in the mitochondrial fatty acid beta-oxidation pathway. The evidence that this enzyme is encoded by a single gene is controversial. In this study we provide evidence for a single-copy and probably autosomal gene for CPT2, by cloning of the human and mouse CPT2 genes. The human and mouse genes are 25.9 and 12.8 kilobases long, respectively. Comparison of the coding regions of the human and mouse genes with the corresponding regions of the rat gene indicated 83% and 76% identity at the nucleotide level, respectively. The mouse and human genes each encode a protein of approximately 58 kDa with 76% amino acid identity. Hybridization studies indicated that the mouse CPT2 gene is located on chromosome 11, whereas the human gene is located on chromosome 16. The proximity of CPT2 to other genes that have been mapped to the 16q24 region, including the alpha-ketoacid dehydrogenase gene E1 alpha and the NADH dehydrogenase genes, suggested that the CPT2 gene may be linked to a tumor suppressor gene. Q: How to split an edge into two edges? I'm designing a bike with 3 wheels: The main frame of the bike has a thickness of 6 mm. The thinness is obtained by a laser cutting process. The edges of the frame that are parallel to the thinness have a thickness of 3 mm. In the two pictures below is a view bcb57fa61b
