Selenium metabolites in urine and plasma are related to lung cancer risk. Urinary and plasma selenium metabolites have been measured in a case-control study of lung cancer in an adult population of New York City. Urine samples were collected during face-to-face interviews, and spot samples of blood were obtained. Selenium metabolites were determined by GLC and semiquantitative methods that allow distinction between selenium forms and indicate whether selenium is combined with an organic acid (e.g., cysteine). Selenoproteins are excreted in urine as the unmodified selenium form, selenomethionine. Selenium in its form combined with organic acids may be excreted as L-selenocystine or mixed selenium-cysteine species. In this study, all selenium metabolites were measured in urine; most of the selenium in plasma was present in the form of selenocysteine. Selenium excretion in urine was significantly related to tobacco consumption and smoking history. For selenoproteins, no relationship was observed between excretion of selenium and selenium metabolites in urine or plasma. The distribution of selenium and selenium metabolites was similar for men with and without lung cancer. The levels of selenium and its metabolites in plasma were equivalent for men with or without lung cancer. However, the distribution of selenium and selenium metabolite concentrations in urine tended to be higher for those with lung cancer. In conclusion, this study indicates that selenium compounds are excreted mainly as selenomethionine, which is metabolized in the body and may be related to the development of cancer.
