Tuesday, August 1, 2010 One of my favorite things to do this time of year is to dust off my brooms and get out into the garden to tidy up the pots. By the time we need a little gardening help, the plants need some TLC. This year, the big silver trees in the back garden were starting to die back, which meant that I needed to prune them. I started up with the red one. The stems are bone dry and dead. Once I start an area, I usually try to have everything planned for that day. I gather all the tools that I need, then start at the back of the plant. The plants are taller than my arm, so I either have to cut up the top of the plant to bring down the top and trim out all the lower branches, or climb up to the top of the tree to reach the highest branches. I also go up the trunk of the plant, if necessary. Trimming the branches off of the top allows me to really get the branch structure so that it is straight and not warty, or misshapen. I'm getting close to harvest time, so the tomatoes need to be pruned back a little bit. What follows is a super short sequence of pictures. I walk up the trunk like this, and look for the lowest branch. Then, if I can see the bottom of the branch, I'll go get the tools to go work on the branch. Of course, I use my pocket-sized pruners. The branch can be a tricky thing to work on. The stem often has multiple, interwoven layers, so you can either have to dig them out with your pruners, cut them off, or cut them away. Because these stems are mostly water, and dry air doesn't hold water well, you can often split these stems in half, or even cross-section them. I can usually also tell with my
